Creation of the Eisenhower Memorial Sculptures
Part II: Making the Bronze with Sculptor Sergey Eylanbekov

"The sculptures in this project are created for the public, for the people to observe them, to think and respond emotionally. That is where the visual power of art is most evident. I hope the bronze images will be strong enough to impress the visitors to the memorial and live in their memories."

- Sergey Eylanbekov, Sculptor

Last issue's special edition, in honor of the 74th anniversary of D-Day, featured the Commission's first of sculptor Sergey Eylanbekov and his multi-step process for creating clay models of the sculptures. If you missed Part I, you can catch up here.

This week we present Part II, a look at how the full-size clay models are transformed into the final bronze statues. The process, called lost-wax casting or investment casting, has been used by artisans around the world for thousands of years. The goal is to take an artist's clay model and reproduce them in bronze, a medium that will stand the test of time.

The lost-wax process requires a series of positive and negative replications of the original clay models. Beginning in the sculptor's studio, rubber and plaster molds are made. A layer of rubber is applied to the clay, followed by an application of plaster for stability. Once the mold is set, it is divided in such a way that it can be removed in pieces from the clay surface. The mold sections are then sent to the foundry. During the process of removing the mold from the clay, the models are destroyed and the clay can be recycled.

Wax Models

After the plaster molds arrive at the foundry, they are used to cast wax models. Wax models are then encased in a liquid ceramic. After the ceramic hardens they are put into a hot furnace or kiln where the wax melts out leaving a void into which the bronze is poured.

Cast Bronze

The statues are cast in pieces and then adjusted and precisely welded together. Seams are removed and residual elements from the casting process are sanded and cleaned. Although there are several ways to cast bronze, the lost-wax method allows for an excellent finish and accurate replication of the artist's details.

Completed Statues

The final step in the process is to apply a corrosive material to form a patina. This application will be done following the casting of the entire sculptural grouping and before the sculptures are set in place at the memorial.
